Un quart de siècle après sa disparition, Duke Ellington semble avoir trouvé sa vraie place dans l'histoire de la musique. L'épreuve du temps est cruelle à l'égard de nombreux artistes qui avaient de leur vivant trouvé chez leurs contemporains une admiration universelle. Ellington a certes goûté pendant près d'un demi-siècle les fruits du succès. On a cependant vite oublié qu'il dut lutter tout au long de sa carrière pour faire entendre et apprécier une musique trop originale pour plaire à tout le monde et très souvent en avance sur son temps. Dès la fin des années vingt, les sonorités du style jungle heurtent les oreilles délicates. Au début des années trente, on accuse le Duke de tourner le dos au "vrai jazz" quand il manifeste le soucis de travailler la forme et de sortir du cadre trop étroit pour lui du 78 tours de trois minutes (écouter à ce propos la Creole Rhapsody). On lui fera le même reproche quand il composera des œuvres de longue durée comme la suite Black, Brown and Beige, dont ne seront enregistrés pour le disque que quelques extraits (écouter la plage 18). On lui fera ensuite grief de se reposer en concert sur quelques succès inoxydables, alors que c'est à la demande d'une bonne partie du public qu'il devait les rejouer, en les renouvelant d'ailleurs sans cesse (cf. Black And Tan Fantasy, donnée ici dans une de ses premières moutures, remodelée cent fois au fil des ans). En fait, le génie d'Ellington éclate aujourd'hui sans discussion à l'écoute des chefs-d'œuvre réunis ici, autant de modèles indémodables de pure et simple beauté (Blue Light), d'invention (Diminuendo And Crescendo In Blue, six minutes de riches variations sur le simple blues de douze mesures...), de grâce (Portrait Of The Lion) ou de swing (Harlem Air Shaft)... Et, tout au long de ces vingt pièces, très modeste sélection pour une première approche d'une œuvre considérable, une modernité et des audaces qui n'ont pas fini de surprendre : les dissonances de Koko, les couleurs inouïes de Saddest Tale, le piano avant-gardiste du maestro dans The Clothed Woman et, entre Diminuendo et Crescendo, la mise en scène somptueuse des solistes dans Concerto For Cootie et Battle Of Swing, la puissance d'évocation de Daybreak Express et de Happy-Go-Lucky Local (deux trains : un rapide et un tortillard), le thème prémonitoire de Cotton Tail, l'utilisation de la voix dans Creole Love Call, The Mooche et Hot And Bothered, et mille autres splendeurs multiples à débusquer au détour de chaque mesure...

A quarter of a century after his disappearance, Duke Ellington seems to have found his place in the history of music. The test of time can be cruel to many artists whose contemporaries showed universal admiration for them when they were alive, and it's true that Ellington tasted the sweet fruit of success for more than fifty years. But this would be forgetting that he fought throughout his entire career for his music to be heard and appreciated – it was too original to please everyone, and it was often music well in advance of its time.

At the end of the Twenties, the sounds of the jungle style were jolting delicate ears. At the beginning of the Thirties, the Duke was accused of turning his back on "real" jazz when he showed interest in working on the form of his music, getting away from the (for him) too narrow frame of a 78 rpm recording that lasted only three minutes (listen to Creole Rhapsody). The same criticism was levelled at him when he wrote lengthy works such as his Black, Brown And Beige suite, only a few excerpts of which were put on record (see track 18). Another reproach was that his concerts were limited to performances of tried and tested hits – forgetting that it was mainly his audiences who requested these tunes – a criticism which ignores the constant reinvention produced by Ellington when he performed them. In this respect, one should listen to Black And Tan Fantasy, a tune remodelled one hundred times over the years, but presented here in one of its earliest versions.

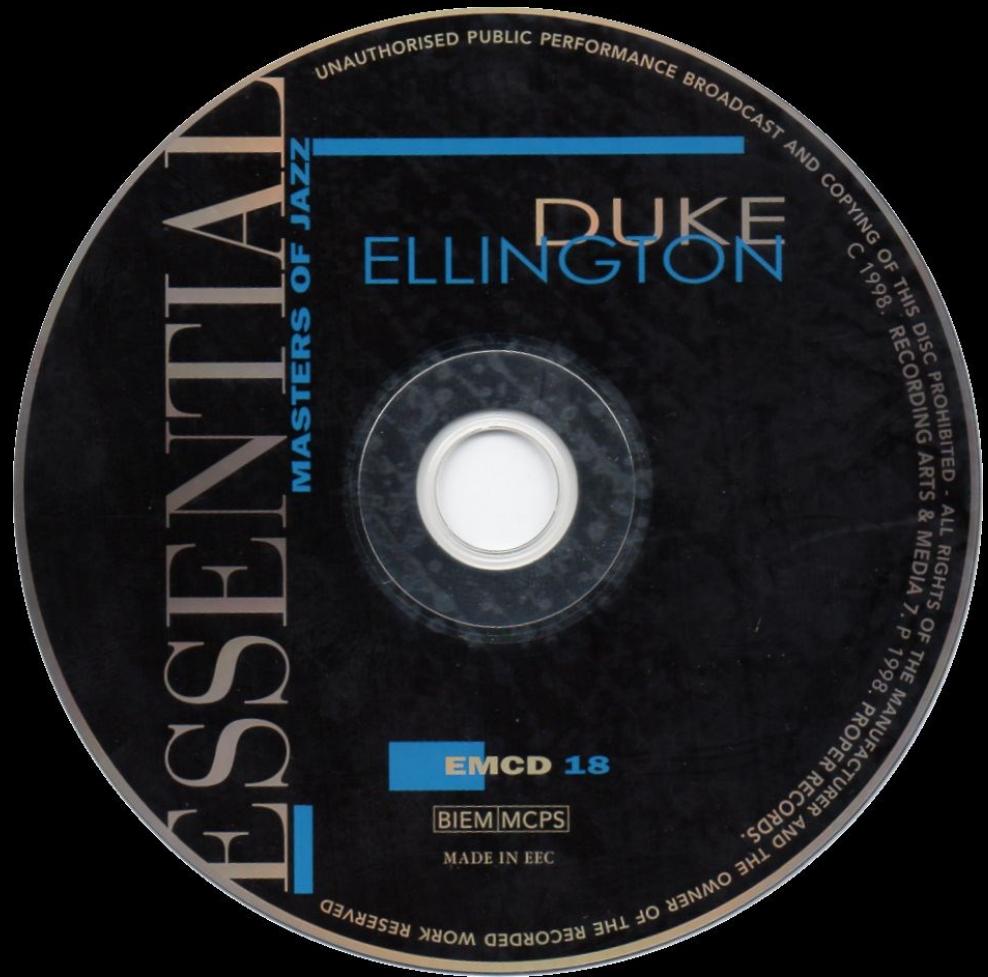

Today, in fact, Ellington's genius is unquestioned. The masterpieces collected here are as many timeless models of pure and simple beauty (Blue Light), inventiveness (Diminuendo And Crescendo In Blue, six minutes of rich variation on a simple twelve-bar blues...), grace (Portrait Of The Lion), and swing (Harlem Air Shaft)...

And throughout these twenty selections, which represent an extremely modest choice for a first approach to Ellington's considerable opus, there shines a modern and audacious spirit which still takes us by surprise : the dissonance of Koko, the incredible colours of Saddest Tale, the maestro's avant-garde piano on The Clothed Woman, and, between Diminuendo and Crescendo, the sumptuous settings created for the soloists in Concerto For Cootie and Battle Of Swing, the powerful evocativeness of Daybreak Express and Happy-Go-Lucky Local (the first a fast train, the latter the opposite), the premonitory theme of Cotton Tail, the way the voice is used on Creole Love Call, The Mooche and Hot And Bothered... and a thousand other splendours to be discovered just round the corner of each and every bar!
